Field of the Invention The present invention relates to methods of and apparatus for dispensing surgical fasteners, and more particularly to surgical fasteners having a looped suture attached thereto and a dispensing apparatus for sequentially dispensing the fastener. 2. Background of the Art Surgeons have long recognized the benefits and advantages of using surgical fasteners to secure tissues, body fluids, and foreign substances to the body to achieve hemostasis (i.e., cessation of bleeding) and to facilitate suturing or other closure procedures. In recent years, surgical fasteners have been utilized to attach body tissue to bone. Such tissue is normally adherent to bone and is often located on deep body tissue with which the surgeon must contend in achieving access to the body tissue that requires the fastening. Often, the surgeon accesses the body tissue that requires fastening, from a remote region of the body which requires the fastening of the tissue to another remote portion of the body.

With manual methods of fastening tissue
