In 2011, Barack Obama called on Congress to “reimagine the public service” by using technology to get big, pricey government projects done more efficiently and more cost-effectively. He envisioned a future where it was “no longer possible to build a highway without first building a cell phone tower to connect it to the rest of the world.” Fast forward to 2019 and the Trump Administration has enacted major changes to U.S. procurement policy that are part of what is now called an “America First” agenda to expand the defense industrial base, cut the cost of American military equipment and reduce the amount spent on overseas operations. The administration has also implemented a goal to have the military pay no more than 10 percent for goods and services acquired overseas. The concepts set forth by the Obama administration, as well as ideas that emerged from discussions with other countries, are reflected in new regulations for defense acquisition that will go into effect on Sept. 15. The new policies will require U.S. defense contractors to have skills to maintain and operate equipment, and force them to acknowledge that their customers in the federal government will be other government agencies and not private customers. On Oct. 2, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) reported on the Trump Administration’s effort to make the acquisition process more efficient, by developing a plan to reduce the number of times government agencies are forced to request funding from Congress for the acquisition of new equipment. This plan will require the government to keep a list of its most essential resources and systems, such as airplanes and ships, and define what makes an aircraft “essential” or “not essential.” “Essential systems and capabilities,” or E3, are required to have minimal maintenance requirements, the report said. The public service mission of the federal government would be highlighted during the acquisition
